“ I looked forward as a child going to visit my Uncle Lawrence at his farm house. He had horses and he would let me tag along with him as he cared for them. I remember my favorite treat of pop tarts and going into the basement to look for frogs as water would enter the basement. My uncle was a quiet, gentle man. I looked forward to visiting with him. One year at a family reunion we played relay games and my uncles including my dad had to suck the milk out of a baby bottle. It is a very fond memory. I'm grateful to have been blessed with a gentle, kind uncle.

“ Uncle Lawrence, as I knew him through my wife who truly adored her uncle as did her sisters, obviously I am a transplant through marriage into the Bussio family. Later in life as I became employed at Geneva Pipe he was also respectfully known as Lawrence.

I know this; Lawrence is one of the true icons of the Geneva Pipe legacy.

Lawrence spent much of his working career as a vital part of the operations of the company he loved and supported working along the side his younger brother and owner Aldo.

Lawrence was a trusted signatory of Aldo's. No question because of the truly honest man that he was.

Lawrence had the up most respect of those in the company as well as customers he served. Due to his quiet nature you had to pay attention to have any idea of his high level of intelligence, love for his work, coworkers, as well as a true commitment to customer service.

If you wanted Lawrence's advice you better be ready for the honest truth, if you needed it the mentoring could be brutally honest at times but it was always the truth. He didn't mix words or beat around the bush when one was willing to ask. That is not without saying he was also humble and kind in the delivery of advice.

He is truly appreciated by those who had an ear to listen to a man who was wise yet extremely quiet. His knowledge and intellect was silently provided without pride, yet he really understood what it took to provide honest selfless friendship and meaningful service. Beyond that he was an amazing mentor to those who were smart enough to stop and listen and learn. Many did hear and for the small part I was lucky enough to learn from uncle Lawrence I am now forever grateful. I wish I would have paused a few more times now.

I know his brother valued his commitment as deeply as can be.

For the tidbits I learned from Lawrence, when joining the company after his retirement, I can tell you this; Lawrence's family was always first. After family people meant everything including at work inclusive of coworkers and customers.

He showed through actions that if you take the time to care about people everything else will come together but you must know Lawrence knew ACTIONS SPEAK LOUDER THAN WORDS.

Lawrence's legacy at Geneva Pipe Company is forever engraved. His legacy as a man is an exemplary and kind life well lived.

The Geneva Family wants the Bussio's to know we are forever grateful for Lawrence's influence on our lives and your willingness to share his time here with us. His life is truly appreciated.

We have seen people who rarely show emotion in tears this week at his passing. He will be missed.
